

A HINDOO'S TOILET.

Morning Scene in an East Indian Compound.

Over the compound, from verandah "go-downs," forms are seen from sleep, each one "wrapping" in doing so of conforming standards urged upon the attendants of the race by Mr. Bryant, but simpler if less poetic reason these draperies constitute his bed. But do not make the mistake that because the requirements of the Hindoo's costume are his toilet is therefore a perfunctory matter. Follow him to the latrine. The chances are that you will find water again, but you will find knowledge. On the brink of a great yawning hole in the ground is as the compound well, whose rim of stone and whose steps lead down to the water's edge, behold the "disk" of the compound. Draperies of the draperies already ready to and in attitudes ranging all from the pose of the "Disk" to that of the most resolute upon a western claim, they stand up in a row from the top of the steps to the bottom. In the hand is a chatty, and one and all engaged in the offices of the morning. And their tub is the well. Grimacing chatters are passed up the empty ones down, legs are feet are scoured, teeth are polished with charcoal and stick, throats are rubbed, noses trumpeted, and, in the whole man receives such a scrubbing, such a molishing, as leaves nothing to be except in connection with the. This latter consideration, however, is one that does not disturb the man, who, priding himself upon being the cleanest platter in the street, devotes but little thought to the inside of the dish.

Sublimations and those of his colleagues concluded, he fills his chatty more from the pure fountain beneath it high in the air, throws his back and with unerring aim pours crystal libation in one long, steady down his open throat, skillfully to receive and conduct it to his proof interior. This done, his eyes are resumed, and he departs for work.

Healy, as out of a catapult, the jumps up from behind the eastern and day is at hand.—Mary Ann Chamberlain in Atlantic.

STORY OF MILLIONS.

Way One Man Had a Fortune Thrust Upon Him.

Story is told of how the reluctant owner of a promissory note by a penniless New York lawyer brought a fortune his pocket amounting to seven millions. The man referred to, M. Bixby, went to New York in from a backwoods district as a starved lawyer. To pay $4 a week and washing kept him on the edge of bankruptcy. He struggled for two or two and was constantly odd jobs outside of the law to get him to exist when a friendly lawyer in whose office he had desk called him aside one day.

"There is a chance for you, Bixby," the lawyer. "I have an estate to be had must get rid of the farm on north side of the city. It is appraised at $200. You can have it at $200. You can have it at $200."

"There is not a dollar to my name," replied Bixby.

"I can give me your note, and I will keep it until you get ready to," replied the lawyer.

A young man hesitated for some time. He was very nervous about placing himself under obligation for so much money, but finally consented. Bixby had to ask for the release of his note two or three times, but he finally secured it. He was to hold the farm until the day of the Erie canal and the first of the city by gas gave the new birth and his farm quickly swallowed in the growth. At the time of his death Bixby's property was worth $7,000,000. Today its value is more than $13,000,000. (Continued in Magazine.)

Mr. Lincoln's Brevity.

Lincoln recalls the fact that in his speech to the notification of Springfield there were words and in his formal letter of acceptance there were 134 words. In his letter of acceptance to the commission in Washington in 1864 there were 230 words. But let us suppose that there were no typewriters, and such a thing as a speech had not been dreamed of. (Continued in Magazine.)

Not.

"We are sorry, darling, or shall we be the short and witty line and later dispatched to the ideal of love."

"When the strangeness of the moment was the girl replied: 'I don't know what you mean.'"
